Claus Oldenburg & Stuart Cohen at the Museum of Modern Art, New York

Mouse Museum and Ray Gun Wing at MOMA

In 1977 the Museum of Contemporary Art in Chicago asked Stuart Cohen to work with the world famous artist Claus Oldenburg on the construction of two demountable exhibition structures. These structures were to display Oldenburg's collection of dime store objects and souvenirs that were inspiration for the artist's work. Originally conceived by Oldenburg as a "museum of popular art" it was to be in the shape of a (Mickey) mouse head. In addition to the Mouse Museum the MCA's exhibit included a second structure, a Ray Gun Wing to display a collection of toy ray guns and gun shaped objects. The two structures were displayed at four other museums including the Whitney Museum in New York. In 1979, the structures were purchased by the Museum Ludwig in Cologne, Germany and have been on permanent display there.

They are currently on display at the Museum of Modern Art until August 5, 2013

Stuart and Julie to Lecture in Santa Fe

Stuart and Julie will be lecturing on house additions at the American Institute of Architect's Custom Residential Conference this August in Santa Fe. Critical of additions that are not in keeping with the architectural language of the original building, their lecture may make things even hotter in Santa Fe.
